The Journal of East Asian Affairs is published twice a year by the Institute for National Security Strategy (INSS). The Institute for National Security Strategy, which was restructured from the former Research Institute for International Affairs, is a nonprofit organization founded in 1977 in Seoul, Korea. The Institute is dedicated to the development of policy recommendations in international relations, economics policy, security, and inter-Korean relations. Currently, it has around 50 resident analysts, many of whom have been trained in the U.S., Europe, and East Asia. The Institute has been publishing The Journal of East Asian Affairs since January 1981. It has around 1,800 worldwide subscriptions, primarily among academics, government officials, and journalists. The Journal can be widely found in the libraries of major universities and research institutes around the world.

The Journal welcomes the submission of manuscripts and review articles associated with East Asia in the fields of international politics, economics, social, and security aspects of contemporary East Asian affairs. Those wishing to contribute articles to the Journal should read the submission guidelines located on the ending part of this issue.

Opinions expressed in the Journal of East Asian Affairs are those of the individual contributors, and represent neither the views of the editors, nor those of Institute for National Security Strategy. Permission to reproduce articles from the Journal should be sought in written form from the editor-in-chief.
